In the aftermath of the 1746 Battle of Culloden near Inverness, Arran MacLeod returns home, his face scarred from the conflict, causing even children to flee from him in fear. He discovers that his father has arranged his marriage to Rowena Munro, a local woman with impaired vision, in exchange for a substantial dowry and land. Rowena's companion, who accompanies her, instantly takes a dislike to Arran.

Resistant to the idea of marriage, Arran is reluctant to be bound, especially to someone he faintly recalls as a lanky, unremarkable girl from his past. His frustration intensifies upon learning that English agents are seeking those who supported Bonnie Prince Charlie, and the local sheriff ominously implies there is a bounty on Arran's head.

However, Arran's recollection of Rowena does not align with the present. She has grown into a stunning woman, yet one who is initially terrified of the daunting, scarred Highlander she is to marry. When Rowena discovers a treacherous plot that puts Arran in danger, she is confronted with a pivotal decision: to choose between her family and the rugged, scarred soldier she has grown to love.
